Syllabus

Description. The course examines relationship between the news media and presidential politics. This year, because of the presidential campaign, we will focus in particular on media and the election. We'll follow the ups and downs and twists and turns of the election season. But we'll also try to understand how campaigns have come to take the form that they do by looking at these issues historically. Topics include the rise of mass-media politics; presidential debates; TV advertising; journalistic objectivity; and the role of the internet in today's campaigns.

Course Requirements.

- Short Paper. Due September 24. There will be an initial 15-page essay, designed to evaluate facility with the readings, ability to frame an argument, and writing skill.
- Term Paper. Due December 12. The final piece of writing for the course is a 25-page paper that explores some aspect of presidential elections in depth. Topics will be given out in class.
- Readings.
Each week there will be assigned readings on the given topic. Usually it will consist of a single book, but some weeks it will be a collection of articles.
- Watching campaign events. Students are expected to watch the conventions, debates and other major political events of the campaign season. They are also expected to read the New York Times and other political publications to stay abreast of campaign news and developments.
